The Butler & the Baker Have Dreams

Pharaoh's butler and baker each had a dream while they were in prison. Joseph interpreted their dreams for them. He told the butler that he would be released from prison and return to serving Pharaoh. He told the baker that he would be put to death.

1. After Joseph told the butler and baker what their dreams meant, we can imagine that the butler was happy and the baker was sad. We are going to make figures of the butler and the baker, and show what they dreamed and how they probably felt.
2. Hand out project sheets and crayon, markers or colored pencils to each child.
3. Have children draw a happy face on one figure. This is the butler. Have them draw a sad face on the other figure. This is the baker.
4. Ask children to draw the two dreams, one in each "bubble" panel. Remind them of the key elements of the two dreams: squeezing grape juice into a cup; birds eating bread from a basket.
5. As the children finish their pictures, help them roll the figures into tubes and secure with pieces of tape.
6. Show children how they can re-enact the story by first having the figures lie down as if sleeping. Then stand them up, as if they were going to tell Joseph their dreams. Slide the appropriate dream picture into the slits at the top of each figure. Remember the happy butler figure goes with squeezing grapes and the sad baker figure goes with the birds eating the bread.

Materials for each child

-1 copy Butler & Baker Figures

-1 copy Dream Panels

-crayons or markers

Prepare in Advance

Cut apart the figures and the dream panels along the dotted lines. Make slits on the figure pieces along the dotted lines.

© 2012 General Church of the New Jerusalem

Butler & Baker Figures

© 2012 General Church of the New Jerusalem

